ABSTRACT
Inverse design based on high-performance computing ability is an efficient and intuitive design method. In this paper, we employed the digitized adjoint method to design a symmetric 3-dB power splitter based on N-ary digital pattern with an occupied compact footprint of only 3.25 $\mu\text{m} \times 2.6 \mu\text{m}$. The digitized adjoint method is applied to inverse design and continuously adjusts and updates the relative permittivity for a cylindrical material filled with the intermediate material to obtain a quasi-digital pattern and then transforms it into a quaternary digital pattern. Based on this approach, a symmetrical structure with etching cylindrical radius of 45, 37, and 30 nm was obtained, which enables the 3-dB power splitter to achieve a precise 50:50 ratio in a wide wavelength range from 1.45 to 1.65 μm . The excess loss is 1.3 dB with 30 nm.

1 | Introduction
In recent years, the silicon-on-insulator (SOI) platform has become an ideal platform for realizing photonic integrated circuits due to its high integration density [1]. Photonic devices are used to manipulate optical fields in multiple dimensions through the interaction of light with various objects and have become an integral component within the field of contemporary optical research [2–3]. Optical power splitters are fundamental photonic devices used to split and combine optical signals [4, 5]. To achieve this function, various structures such as Y-branching [6], directional coupler (DC) [7], and multimode interference (MMI) [8] have been proposed. In 2018, by cascading two MMI couplers of different sizes, Tian et al. [9] proposed a 1 $\times$ 3 MMI coupler with a size of 15 $\mu\text{m} \times 15 \mu\text{m}$ and a large working bandwidth of more than 50 nm (from 1.54 to 1.59 μm). However, the design of a traditional power splitter is performed through a forward design method, which is founded upon established physical principles, followed by the estimation of geometric parameters and manual parameter adjustment through experiments or electromagnetic simulations [11–14], and the dimensions of the designed components are considerable, which restricts the high-density integration of silicon-based photonic devices. Therefore, photonic devices based on inverse design provide an effective method for simultaneously designing ultra-compact and highly functional devices [15]. In 2018, Chang et al. [16] proposed a 1 $\times$ 2 power splitter by using an inverse design algorithm, achieving a compact size of 2.88 $\mu\text{m} \times 2.88 \mu\text{m}$. The device performance with an excess loss
